

Food Site Certification

A Constantly Growing Industry

There are over 33,000 companies in the United States that are defined as food and beverage (F&B) process manufacturers. The industry continues to expand despite economic recessions and has continually evolved to meet the ever-changing demands of consumers. Combined, these companies employ more than 1.6 million people.

Why Food Site Certification?

Speed to market continues to be an important factor with F&B clients in selecting sites or buildings, especially given the industry's growth. Before much time is expended in evaluating the community, workforce, and business climate, clients want to know that a potential site meets the rigorous criteria that are required for any food and beverage processing facility.

Primus Builders and Garner Economics have partnered to create one of the most extensive certification initiatives in the economic development and food and beverage industry. The process helps communities prepare for the location of F&B projects, which in turn helps companies in the industry (many of whom are our current clients) know that a community has met Primus/Garner's rigorous review requirements.

The Site Certification Process

The Primus/Garner certification process includes an assessment of the site against a database of hundreds of criteria and variables necessary to support the critical business decisions of a food industry manufacturer; a comprehensive labor analysis focused on the workforce requirements of the food and beverage industry; potential building drawings so that a prospective client can see how a building may be defined on the site; and a report detailing how the site meets or exceeds the certification criteria.

If, after being vetted through the process, the site does not meet the criteria, an explanation of what needs to be done to achieve certification is provided to the client.

“ Primus partners with Garner Economics to provide a full range of site location services to its clients. We use Garner Economics exclusively for these services in conjunction with our corporate clients because the work of Jay and his team is simply outstanding. Our clients are thrilled with the deliverables and outcomes from Garner which means we are happy too.”
